Water contamination case settled for $1.2 million

ALEXANDRIA, LA — A water contamination case involving more than 100 residents and the city of Pineville has been settled after nearly four years, The Town Talk reported.

Insurance companies representing the city of Pineville and Pan American Engineers, the city's engineering firm, agreed to settle the residents' lawsuit for $1.2 million on March 2, the article said.

The residents' water was contaminated in 2000 when a city employee inadvertently connected a business' sewerage pipe to a 6-inch water pipe.

At the time the problem was discovered, an engineer for the city said health risks to affected residents were "minimal" because of the chlorine the city adds to the water, the paper reported.

The problem was brought to city officials' attention by a resident who noticed "white stringy matter" had clogged filters on a washing machine and a dishwasher. The material also clogged an icemaker. The material turned out to be toilet paper.

Water was tested for several months after the incident, but several families had varying degrees of health problems as a result of the contamination, the article stated.
